Personal Experience Profile

While the type of prose included in this section may break from traditional expectations, I have served in enough hiring roles to know that the vast majority of resumes and curriculum vitae do little to give the reader any true sense of the person on the other side of the paper. With that understanding, I would rather risk a break from tradition in hopes of better communicating at least a brief sense of who I am and how I view my professional and personal roles in the field of nursing.

I had a vision of being a nurse educator while enrolled in my ADN program, but never would have imagined that my entry into the world of academia would begin so early in my nursing career. After 3 years at the bedside I was fortunate enough to begin working for the same program where I received my initial nursing education. I have since gone on to obtain my MSN-Education degree and transition to a full-time faculty role within the college. This job affords me the opportunity to continually grow as an educator, the first job I have never had any reservations about waking up and going to on a daily basis, but also provides much needed balance in my life. In addition to being a nurse and a nurse educator, I am also passionately fierce about my commitments as a husband and father. While I maintain a role as a bedside ICU nurse, the transition into my role in education has allowed me to better allocate my time and energy between all my daily commitments.

In my professional role I am heavily focused on pioneering, re-envisioning, and incorporating Active-Learning Strategies into nursing education at the ADN level, and I don't foresee that motivation dwindling any time in the near or distant future.
